our roads our skies our future

Both road transport and aviation are industries in crisis.

Transport workers at the TWU have spent a decade aligning Enterprise Agreements to expire in 2026 to lift standards in the industry together.

- Road transport is the deadliest industry in Australia, plagued by huge pressures from the top of the supply chain for faster and cheaper transport.
- Aviation has been decimated. In difficult times taxpayer money is handed out with no strings attached. In good times huge profits are siphoned straight back to executives' pockets with no benefit to workers or communities.

Working with responsible clients and employers

- The TWU has always and will continue to work with clients and employers committed to decent standards—but workers are ready to take action where outliers refuse to commit to fair pay and conditions

The future of road transport and aviation

- With the rise of AI, automation and the transition to net zero, decent jobs must be at the heart of transport, and decent outcomes for our communities

Lifting standards for workers and communities

- In their current state road transport and aviation do not serve our communities: workers, road-users, and the travelling public. We need to lift standards right across these industries

It's time for transport that works for everyone. In 2026, tens of thousands of TWU members are prepared to take action to make that happen.
